

WHERE TO ACTUALLY START

The five jobs worth automating first in a small business

Not the chatbot. Start with the money that leaks quietly, every week, without anyone noticing.

Answering the phone you miss

Every missed call is a job somebody else quoted for. It never appears on a report and never gets blamed for anything, which is exactly why it survives for years.

START WITH

Where your calls actually go after five rings. Ring it yourself at 4pm on a Friday.

02 / 05

Turning a job into a quote

Notes and photos in, a priced document out. The gap between visiting a job and sending the number is where warm work goes cold, and it is usually measured in days.

START WITH

Your last ten quotes. How many hours between the visit and hitting send?

03 / 05

Chasing the invoice

Polite, on time, every time, without you having to decide to do it. A lot of what gets called a cash flow problem is really a chasing problem wearing a disguise.

How many days past due your average paid invoice actually was.

04 / 05

The follow-up nobody does

You have already done the expensive part. You visited, you priced it, you wrote it up. A quote that is never chased once is the cheapest revenue in the building.

START WITH

Quotes you sent more than fourteen days ago that nobody ever replied to.

05 / 05

Writing the same reply again

If you have typed it twenty times, it should not need typing a twenty-first. Most inboxes have about five questions on permanent repeat and everyone answers them from scratch.

Your sent folder. Find the five things you keep explaining.

Pick one. Not five.

The businesses that get real value out of this are the ones that fixed a single process properly and left everything else alone until it was genuinely working. Doing all five at once is how you end up with five half-built things and no time back.

Which of these is costing you most right now, the phone or the paperwork?
